SYNOPSIS

Lola is a jet-setting business consultant who excels at the aggressive tactics and nonstop work her job requires. She travels back and forth from Vienna, where her tasteful apartment serves more as mailbox and laundromat than home, to the headquarters of the latest corporation she's restructuring. Her routine is one of late nights at the office, fancy client dinners and brief nights of sleep in sterile hotel rooms. Approaching 30, Lola is beautiful, works out, and her career seems on a fast track to success.

Lola manages her personal life with the same ruthless efficiency she uses to optimize profit margins. She keeps her relationship with her boss Elise secret, as well as the existence of her older sister Conny, who has a long history of mental illness. But when she receives the news that Conny has attempted suicide, Lola's secrets threaten to explode into the open. As she tries to do what's best for her sister without jeopardizing all she's worked so hard for, Lola slowly finds her own grip on reality slipping away.

IN CONVERSATION WITH MARIE KREUTZER

What inspired you to set THE GROUND BENEATH MY FEET in the business consulting world, and how did you research this world to prepare the film?

I've been interested in business consulting for quite a while. My stepsister worked in consulting in her twenties and I did a short documentary about her in 2004. It was difficult though because everything concerning her work was confidential and it was not possible to film her "work world" directly. I think I already thought about a fictional story in that setting while not being able to capture it. It might be a coincidence, but I also had a difficult time in 2004, work-wise, and was very exhausted and depressed, which I couldn't really "name" at that time. Looking back I think that maybe the subject of having to function and to perform all the time related more to me than I thought, and it still does.

I had the opportunity to talk to several ex-consultants. Three of them read the script in different stages. Their feedback always came quickly, clearly, and was extremely productive. Although they didn't work as consultants anymore, the years of having to be extremely efficient were noticeable in how they worked with me, and how they talked to me. Sometimes the way the words were chosen taught me more about the world they had lived in than what they were talking about. I was not really surprised by what I heard, but what I love about research are the details and finding the tone, the colours, the texture of a universe. Of course a consultant's job is exactly what we imagine it to be, but people are only good at what they do if they believe in it, and that's what interested me. The people we are talking about are very intelligent and educated. But they are also very young and looking for a meaning in what they do.

At the same time I think the world of consulting is not far away from where most of us are. I don't have to wear a suit for work, but still there's times in my life when I cannot turn off my phone, receive twenty emails an hour and when there is no room for weakness, or at least for me it seems that way. We are all running all the time. And it's no wonder many of us are exhausted and need different kinds of treatment or drugs to deal with what society wants us to be. A psychiatrist who read the script said to me: Not 100% of Conny is mental illness and not 100% of anyone else is sane. That is what the film is about, for me: There is a darkness in all of us.

How did you develop Lola's character and her combination of hardness and vulnerability?

I can't talk much about "creating" Lola because she was just there. She is so many women I have seen. Actually women I am highly irritated by, personally. We all struggle for perfection all the time and it's sick. And those who seem to deny the fact that it's a struggle, those are the women who irritate and fascinate me at the same time.

Lola was also inspired by Hitchcock's MARNIE, unconsciously, but MARNIE came up again and again. What they have in common is their independence, their way of living without relying on anyone, refusing to see their own darkness. They are absolutely alone and that makes them characters who are also very touching and vulnerable while at the same time being so "hard". Actually MARNIE made me decide that Lola would have to be a Blonde.

I never judge my characters, I couldn't tell their stories if I would. I understand Lola in every moment of the film. It was a shock to me to find out late in the editing process how much of Lola is inside me! It was at a time when the first people saw the film and reacted very, very differently and I was confronted with my fears of failing and not being good enough while blaming myself for not being home enough, working too much and working out too little. Lola cannot save Conny. Lola has to save herself. I am not saying she achieves that during this film!

It was the first time you worked with Valerie Pachner. Did she bring anything specific that changed or inflected the role?

Every actress and actor brings something specific, and a film changes with every cast decision. What I liked about Valerie was that she seemed absolutely down-to-earth, unlike Lola. She is a warm person, and I was looking for that contrast. There is nothing insecure about Valerie, at least nothing I could see! She is so "here", which is not only what makes actresses and actors really good, but something so different from Lola who's thoughts are never where her feet are. I didn't have to work much! Sometimes I made something up between takes because she was so good that I wouldn't have needed a second one. I let her try another subtext or listened to her thoughts while knowing I already had everything I needed.

Lola's sister, Conny suffers from schizophrenia. How did you research her mental illness and world of the psychiatric ward for the film?

My aunt was diagnosed with schizophrenia in her early twenties. So I unknowingly researched for decades! When I worked on the script I talked to several psychiatrists and psychologists, visited the psychiatric wards and spent time there. I mean hours, not weeks, because it's really too much if you are a sensitive person like me. I don't know any other place that is so uncanny. Literally everybody walking down the hall or sitting in a chair eating lunch seems unpredictable. But that's not only scary, it attracts me at the same time. The funny thing is that when I was asked to describe charisma once I also used the word "unpredictability".

So, that was maybe the most important thing about Conny. And although the character was already written as an unpredictable person, a person that would always make you insecure, an irritating, moody, but at the same time almost too confident woman, I had to find ways to make her even less foreseeable while shooting to REALLY irritate Valerie and other actors around her.

Do you see THE GROUND BENEATH MY FEET in the continuity of your previous work, or does it feel like a departure from the other films you have directed?

I don't think strategically. I do what I am interested in and what I'm drawn to. Just like a consultant, I'm only good if I believe in what I do. I don't care about genre and there is no master plan of an oeuvre! The first treatment of THE GROUND BENEATH MY FEET was already written between my first and second feature film, it just took me some time. It doesn't feel like a departure, I didn't work differently and I am surprised how different people seem to perceive it from my other films.

I always love my characters and I always love my actors. I take them seriously and I believe in the script. Every film is its own universe and I love to go with it, to be prepared and then leave all the thinking behind and just being intuitive on set. Actually a big issue during writing, shooting, and editing the film was something that is familiar to me: The fear that the main character might not be lovable for the viewer. But I had the exact same issue with Gruber in GRUBER IS LEAVING and Stella in WE USED TO BE COOL.

Lola seems to have arranged her life perfectly and achieved 'success', but as often, it's family that catches up with her.

Family is the best subject! Because you can't choose your family. You're born and your family history is already there. You can't create or influence it. You can leave a partner or friend but even if you leave your family, they will always be a part of you.

It's a film where we at times feel one step ahead and at others one step behind Lola. What was important to you in the film's pacing?

I hardly ever think about pacing during the shoot and I film every scene from beginning to end, no pieces, no pick-ups. Working with my editor Ulrike Kofler has maybe become my favourite part of filmmaking – it's not as stressful as shooting, I don't have to argue so much, and it's so beautiful to have all that material and make something with it.

But what you are talking about is maybe more script-related. Unpredictability was important. Not only because of suspense but because of the feeling it gives you as a viewer to never really know HOW this story is told to you. Nobody takes your hand and shows you what to think. An actor who saw the film found the end was undecided, but to me it was important to let the viewer decide. For me the end is absolutely clear.
